Jennifer came up to me and my friend in person in the cafeteria. She then asked us to vote for her and to scan the code. We took a picture and thanked her, thinking she would leave, but she did not. She stood there and directed us to the website. She watched me login and directed me to her ballot number. I thought she would leave after that and tried to bring my phone screen closer to me because she kept looking. She still continued to stand there and wouldn't leave, trying to see through my phone screen if I submitted the vote. Then she told me again to submit the form by pressing the yellow button and to show it to her. After I submitted and showed her, she continued to do the same thing to my friend. The next day, I was also in the cafeteria, and she was going around the same thing. She came to me again to double-check that I had voted for her and then left. In about 15 minutes, I had left the cafeteria and was going back in again. Aditya had given me his flyer, thanked me, and then walked away. Jennifer comes out from the same door, and I had his flyer folded in my hand (so the white side is up). She laughed and said, "You voted for me, right? "It's hilarious that Aditya handed you his flyer; you voted for me already," she remarked before leaving. On the same day, I was having lunch in the cafeteria later in the day, and Jennifer was still going around doing the same thing. There was a girl who was sitting at the table behind me, and I asked her to do the same thing. Except this time she left her flyer and yellow folder on the other person's table and walked away, but I could clearly see she was watching them vote. So then I interfered and let the other person know that she can vote when she feels comfortable and does not need to vote for Jennifer unless she feels comfortable and wants to. I also told her that once you login and vote, you can only log in once. When

Jennifer saw me do this, she walked up to me and tried to talk to me, but I was not interested. So she got her stuff from the other person and left.

This part is not necessarily part of the complaint, but I think it's something you should know about. I was in the library, and it was about 1 o'clock, and I saw Jennifer talking with the other candidates, Joe Maggard and Thomas Cheung (who are running for president and vice president). They were talking at the library for a while, and I thought nothing about it. But the next day, both Joe and Thomas were going around the cafeteria with their posters, asking people to vote for them. I was sitting between two tables. A person was in front of me, which both of them went to to ask for a vote, and then they skipped me and went to the table behind me. I am not claiming anything against them, but I think it's something that should be worth Investigating.
